Undershot teeth.

Would a slightly undershot female carry that trait to her offspring?

Sharon De Wit I have a litter now from a female with a small undershot and the sire to the litter has no undershot. 2 of the pups have exactly the same like their dam (for now, possibly it will change later maybe).

I also have a female Wormditt's Gr Ch Tornado blood and both of her parents have undershot and she has it very much too.

I'll post photos below of both females

Sharon De Wit And the female who's having a litter at this moment. It's very very small but still 2 of the pups have it too.

Richard Garcia Yes. Any trait can be passed on.

She will most likely pass it on because many pit bulls throughout the history of the breed have been undershot, and it's not necessarily a bad thing because some of the best performers have been undershot.

Also, she will most likely throw an even bite to her offspring as well.

Jimmy John Whited Yes and try to use your fingers to keep the front closed as much as possible while showing the canines ... if the dog don't want to close mouth for ya a quick blow on their nose usually makes them close it ...and I don't mean hit the dog but rather blow in its face with your mouth... ha ha. I've been misunderstood for that before.

Antonio S Vitale And yes she may pass it but she may not more than likely won't, if she does pass it won't be no worse than what hers is and it'll probably only be pup or too, if the canines lineup that's the more important part

Antonio S Vitale Basically if you have a well-bred female and her under bite is only thing pulling her back and she structured well and meets the breed standard you're golden, not going to hold her back too much
